- The Rise of McCarthyism: Senator Joseph McCarthy's rise to prominence was inextricably linked to HUAC's activities. McCarthy's unsubstantiated claims about communist infiltration of the government fueled the anti-communist frenzy, creating a climate where accusations alone could ruin reputations and lives. This period, now known as McCarthyism, is synonymous with the excesses of HUAC.
- The Second Red Scare: HUAC operated within the larger context of the Second Red Scare, a period of intense anti-communist hysteria in the United States. This context significantly impacted the committee's power and the public's reaction to its investigations. Fear of communist subversion permeated every aspect of American life, creating an environment where HUAC's actions were often met with unquestioning acceptance.

- The Hollywood Blacklist: Perhaps the most infamous aspect of HUAC's activities was the Hollywood Blacklist, a list of actors, writers, directors, and other entertainment professionals who were blacklisted for their alleged communist affiliations. This had a devastating impact on the careers and lives of many individuals. This is a key example of how anti-communist sentiment, fueled by HUAC, directly impacted the lives of everyday citizens.
